Market Analysis

The world Alzheimer's therapeutics market was estimated at USD 4.0 billion in 2015 due to the increasing prevalence and predominance rates of this disease and growing geriatric population base. In 2015, it had been projected that 47 million people were being with Alzheimer's Disease (AD) across the world. It mostly occurs within the older people that are 65 years and above. Furthermore, increasing awareness level regarding its symptoms, like partial dementia, is projected to spice up the demand. The development of latest and advanced technologies is expected to contribute to the development of the general market. as an example, the event of latest cloud-based cognitive assessment systems is predicted to propel the growth. These systems help in identification of effects of medicine in patients. Hence, with the support of this technique, pharmaceutical companies can evaluate the ability and wellbeing of pipeline drugs for the treatment of this disease.

The increasing government funding for the Alzheimer's care, regime, and research interests is valued to fuel the extension of this industry. Various organizations involved during this activity include the National Institute of Health (NIH), Alzheimer's Association, and therefore the Florida Department of Health.

Recently, an alternative proposal referred to as Alzheimer's Combination Therapy Opportunities was introduced together of Alzheimer's Drug Discovery Foundation, Alzheimer's Association, and Alzheimer's Society UK. This proposal is anticipated to supply this market with growth opportunities. This proposal includes a mixture of repositioned or repurposed drugs that have the potential to hamper the progression of AD.
