MARKET ANALYSIS

The market for ENT devices was estimated at USD 23.0 billion in 2022, and from 2023 to 2030, it is anticipated to increase at a CAGR of 5.74%. Increasing elderly populations, rising frequency of ENT-related illnesses, and increasing use of less invasive ENT operations are some of the important factors driving market expansion. Technological developments are essential to the market's expansion.

Due to their high cost and the fact that their usage is primarily restricted to rich nations like the U.S., the demand for modern ENT equipment and systems, such as robot-assisted endoscopes, is low in emerging economies. However, it is projected that rising per capita income and more healthcare spending by other countries would dramatically increase market penetration. Due to the high prevalence of Head and Neck illnesses, such as hearing loss and sinusitis, as well as increased attempts to improve access to healthcare facilities in these countries, sales are predicted to expand quickly in emerging nations.

In patients, especially in industrialised nations, hearing loss or impairment has become one of the most prevalent disorders. nearly 460 million individuals, or about 5% of the world's population, currently live with a hearing loss that prevents them from hearing normally. By 2050, that number is projected to rise to nearly 900 million, or one in every ten people. Living longer and greater noise pollution, which results in more occurrences of hearing loss associated with ageing, are two of the primary causes of this. Other typical causes of hearing loss in low-income nations include measles, middle ear infections, and meningitis. Additionally, hereditary predisposition, vascular issues, physiological ageing of the ear, chronic inflammation, noise exposure, and vascular problems can all contribute to hearing loss.

The use of emerging technologies like AI and ML as well as developments in auditory goods are boosting the industry's growth. For instance, the AI hearing aid Arc-AI was introduced by the health technology company Audible in October 2021. It is available in a variety of forms, including behind-the-ear and fully in-canal types, and is designed to automatically change hearing level. Lively introduced an online audiology platform in January 2019 that offers all clients hearing aids, testing, and 24/7 online assistance. Without having to go to a clinic or retail location, all platform users may connect with an audiologist through video conference and get hearing aids.
