MARKET ANALYSIS

The Global Quantum Computing Market was valued at USD 10.13 billion in 2022 and is expected to exceed USD 125 billion by 2030, growing at a projected CAGR of 36.89% from 2023 to 2030. Quantum computing is the branch of computer science that employs the ideas of quantum theory. It is a new, advanced technology that is rapidly growing. It employs quantum mechanics rules to assist classical computers in solving problems that are difficult for them to solve. Quantum computers, which are based on ideas from quantum physics, have been used to perform calculations. It is distinct from traditional computing in terms of speed, bits, and data. Classical computing only uses two bits, 0 and 1, but this system uses all of them.

Space and defence agencies around the world are investing more and more in the development of quantum computing technologies so that quantum computers can be used to implement various optimization and simulation strategies. Governments all over the world are investing heavily in helping their research institutions develop quantum computing technologies. China is making significant investments in quantum computing advancement and research. The governments of the United States, Australia, and a few European Union countries are working on quantum computing. For example, in August 2017, the Commonwealth Bank (CBA), Telstra, the federal government, the New South Wales government, and the University Of New South Wales (UNSW) invested $83 million to launch the first quantum computing project.

The North American market has grown significantly because it is highly competitive, and people there are quick to adopt new technologies. The number of countries in the region that are ready to use the cloud, and the number of end users who are ready to build advanced services, are both positive indicators for the overall growth of the North American market.
