Why biotechnology

- Biotechnology combines biology and chemistry with mathematics and physics to supply the resources needed for contemporary biology and biomedical research.
- Living cells and cellular materials are used in biotechnology to produce medicinal, diagnostic, agricultural, environmental, and other products that support humanity.
- It's also used to research and manipulate genetic material in animals in order to model and study human diseases.
- Biotechnology is both a fundamental and a practical science. Agriculture, health care, forensics, industrial processing, and environmental conservation all benefit from these developments
