MARKET ANALYSIS

The gastrointestinal medicines industry is divided into two parts: prescription and over-the-counter (OTC) gastrointestinal drugs. Similarly, the diagnostics and testing market, medical devices (endoscopy), and vaccines market are separated into three broad segments: diagnostics and testing, medical devices (endoscopy), and vaccines.

Market trends: During the projected period, the gastrointestinal therapeutics market is estimated to grow at a CAGR of 6.8%.

The COVID-19 epidemic disrupted global supply lines, wreaking havoc on the healthcare industry. The gastrointestinal treatments market, on the other hand, grew steadily because to the link between Covid-19 and GI patients.

The rising prevalence of gastrointestinal diseases as a result of poor dietary habits, an increase in the number of clinical trials with accurate results, rising healthcare expenditure, and an increase in the geriatric population are all contributing to the growth of gastrointestinal therapeutics market.

Targeting a wide spectrum of next-generation treatments, including innovative small compounds and cellular therapy, is identified. With an increase in surgical operations and hospitalizations due to GI disorders, all of these variables, as well as biopharmaceutical firms' increased R&D expenditure in creating biologics and biosimilars, are important. According to the National Clinical Study registry, there were around 6,443 on-going clinical trials linked to gastrointestinal illnesses at various stages of development as of May 2021. Positive findings from these trials might open up new avenues for successful medicines in the future.

Participants in the industry are progressively concentrating on generating effective therapeutic goods. Collaborations with specialist firms in gastrointestinal therapies are helping the companies significantly increase their pipeline and product range.
