Metabolomics 2018 includes the study of recent advancements in the field of Metabolomics and Systems Biology. It focuses on the discussions regarding the chemical processes involving metabolites, molecular intermediates and products of metabolism. The rapidly emerging field of metabolomics combines strategies to identify and quantify cellular metabolites using sophisticated analytical technologies. Statistical and multi-variant methods are used for information extraction and data interpretation. There are four conceptual approaches in metabolomics: target analysis, metabolite profiling, metabolomics, and metabolic fingerprinting. Target analysis includes the determination and quantification of a small set of known metabolites whereas metabolite profiling aims at the analysis of a larger set of compounds. In metabolomic fingerprinting, a metabolic signature is generated and then compared in a large sample population to identify the differences between the samples. Metabolomics bridges the gap between genotype and phenotype. It provides a more comprehensive view of how cells function, identifying the striking changes in specific metabolites.
