Market Analysis

The global orthopedic navigation systems market size was valued at € 110.52 million in 2016 and is expected to grow at a CAGR of 10.6% over the forecast period. Rising base of geriatric population, increasing cases of joint reconstruction, increasing awareness levels among patients & healthcare professionals, and high level of healthcare expenditure are high growth rendering drivers.

Associated advantages of computer-assisted surgeries, such as low blood loss, shorter hospital stay, and easier rehabilitation, are other factors expected to drive the industry revenue. Computer-Assisted Surgery (CAS) is instrumental in delivering accurate implant alignment, provides improved functionality, causes less pain & fewer complications, improves quality-adjusted life year, and causes less tissue damage.

There is significant blood loss during conventional joint replacement procedures. Studies have shown that only 9% blood transfusion is required during CAS as compared to 23% in conventional surgery. CAS has also been reported to reduce allogenic blood transfusion by 50%. CAS has been demonstrated to be more accurate in implant alignment and provides faster rehabilitation as compared to conventional procedures. Due to the abovementioned factors, demand for minimally invasive surgery is increasing rapidly. Minimally invasive replacement surgery consists of lesser muscles and tendons distribution, making the reconstruction procedure more natural.
