Market Analysis

- According to a new technical market research report, Human Sexual and Reproductive Health Technologies Products and Global Markets, the global market for reproductive technologies and products are expected to reach nearly $16.1 billion in 2013. BCC Research projects the market to grow to nearly $19.6 billion by 2018, and register a five-year compound annual growth rate of 4.1% from 2013 to 2018.

- Many factors influence the human reproductive arena. Countries differ in their approaches and acceptance of fertility, contraception and sexual dysfunction. Culture, religion and social environment all play a role. Depending on the country and position of women in the society, it can make a significant difference on how reproduction is treated. For example, the choice of contraception varies by country. In Japan, condoms and abortions are preferred to other methods. In India, sterilization is the preferred method of birth control, while in Africa, injectable birth control dominates. In China, the use of the coil is preferred. This difference in preference by country is also seen in both the fertility and sexual dysfunction areas as well.

- In each of the three major areas of infertility, contraception and sexual dysfunction, there has been increasing interest and advancements. New developments in the area of contraception have stepped up the quest for easier, safer, and more convenient methods of contraception. A growing global population, improving access to healthcare, recognition of sexual dysfunction as a medical disorder, and growing demand for contraceptive and fertility products will drive steady growth in this market over the near term.
