Market Analysis

Aging describes the number of changes in a human being with time which includes physical, physiological and social changes and Gerontology is the study of these aspects of aging. Gerontology is different from geriatrics which is the branch of medicine that emphasizes on the treatment of the diseases present in older adults. Though both gerontology and geriatrics have different aspects but the main objective is to improve the quality of adulthood lifetime. Aging is one of the known risk factors for large number of human diseases. The goal of geriatric care management is to encourage good health, improve the overall quality of life and help maintain their personal freedom for as long as possible. It assimilates health care with physiological care along with some services like home care, housing services, nutritional services as well as financial and legal planning. The science of gerontology has progressed as longevity has enhanced. The research on aging is now being done in number of laboratories which focuses on the areas of cellular and molecular biology genetics, biochemistry and behavior.
