The current world of immunological research has expanded considerably, even in the current environment of highly interdisciplinary and collaborative science, future immunologists will probably need to be at least familiar with computational, structural and system biology, nanotechnology and tissue engineering for example. At the same time, from primarily a host defence mechanism to a fundamental homeostatic system with organism-wide physiological and clinical significance and potentially transformative biotechnological and therapeutic applications, our perspective of the immune system has gradually developed. Thus this International Conference on Immunology will be focusing on all aspects for improving humans' health.
