Montreal is the most crowded region in the region of Quebec and the second-most crowded in Canada. Initially called Ville-Marie, or "City of Mary," it is accepted to be named after Mount Royal, however there is some civil argument about this. The city has an unmistakable four-season mainland atmosphere, with warm-to-hot summers and frosty, cold winters. In 2016, Montreal had a populace of 1,704,694. Montreal's metropolitan zone had a populace of 4,098,927 and a populace of 1,958,257 in the urban agglomeration, with the majority of the districts on the Island of Montreal included. Legitimately a French-talking city, 60.5% of Montrealers communicate in French at home, 21.2% communicate in English and 19.8% talk not one or the other. Montreal is a standout amongst the most bilingual urban communities in Quebec and Canada, with 56% of the populace ready to talk both authority dialects. Montreal is the second-biggest basically French-talking city on the planet after Paris.
