From the American Common War until World War II, Alabama, in the same way as other states in the southern U.S., endured monetary hardship, to some extent on account of its proceeded with reliance on agribusiness. Like other southern states, Alabama officials disfranchised African Americans and numerous poor whites when the new century rolled over. Notwithstanding the development of real ventures and urban focuses, white rustic interests ruled the state governing body from 1901 to the 1960s; urban interests and African Americans were notably under-spoken to.
