Market Analysis

More than one in four American women took at least one drug for conditions like anxiety and depression last year, according to an analysis of prescription data. The report, by pharmacy benefits manager Medco Health Solutions Inc, found the use of drugs for psychiatric and behavioral disorders in all adults rose 22% from 2001. The medications are most often prescribed to women aged 45 and older, but their use among men and in younger adults climbed sharply. In total, more than 20% of American adults were found to be on at least one drug for mental health disorders. A number of celebrities have gone public in recent years with their battles with mental health disorders.

In 2016, almost one out of every five adults in the United States had some form of mental illness in the preceding year. Nearly 7% of all adults suffered a major case of depression within the same period. American Indians and native Alaskans have the highest level of mental health issues, while Asians and Pacific Islanders have the lowest. Oregon and Utah are the two states where the highest percentage of poor mental health is reported, while South Dakota and New Jersey are reported to have the lowest percentage.
