Who'd be attending?

Pediatric gastroenterology developed as a sub-specialty of pediatrics and gastroenterology. It is concerned with treating the gastrointestinal tract, liver and pancreas of children from infancy until the age of eighteen. The principal diseases associated with it are acute diarrhea, persistent vomiting, gastritis, and problems with the development of the gastric tract.

Pediatric gastroenterology has reached great heights in North America and Europe. It began with the speciality of pediatrics, which was developed along with children's hospitals in the 19th century. The concept of specialists concentrating on organ specific specialties started around the same time. Dr. Samuel Gee contributed to the development of the specialty in London with his focus on serious clinical conditions in children remarkably celiac disease and cyclic vomiting syndrome.
